Apple is again making a big splash with its new iPad and iPhone 4S models, but when it comes to tablets, the company doesn't come close to matching the multimedia and camera power of rival devices from Google and Microsoft. Sure, Apple's tablets are lightweight, but they offer a very limited feature set compared to the features found on the Samsung Galaxy Tab, Motorola Xoom, and other Android options that are on the market.

Profiles provide the basis for easy tag editing. The Goal, Expert, and Test Profiles could be renamed as "Portrait," "Landscape," or "All Weather" users. This makes it easier to associate images with certain collections. Lightroom 5 allows you to sort collections by any criteria you'd like. For example, you can create a collection of images that have been edited or unedited. Or, you can create a collection that you want to share with a friend. As long as you have the items "sorted," you'll be able to find them quickly. You still have the option of using Smart Collections. There is no option to create "Random Collections." For this, you'd have to resort to the "Create a Smart Collection" feature from within the Smart Collection panel, and then sort through them individually. In this release, Adobe has made a number of updates, including a cloud document feature that enables you to share your work with collaborators across multiple platforms, with the ability to add notes and comments. You can also send a link to a web-based version of your document for others to view and comment on. You can still work on a document offline, too — and Photoshop makes it easier than before with a new detection feature that lets you select and edit the foreground object even if it's obscured by others. Another new feature is Photoshop's cloud feature. If you don't have a Creative Cloud account, you'll find that the Live Photo stream option makes it easier to organize images and add watermarks from your smartphone's camera. If you do have the account and are in a web browser, you'll find that sharing a link to your artwork is incredibly easy. Once the work is posted, anyone can comment and even leave it open.
