In the past decade, the development of community treatment orders (CTOs) has greatly increased. People with severe mental illness are treated predominantly in the community. They enter treatment with a diagnosis of schizophrenia or other mental illness and are often discharged with a diagnosis of schizophrenia. Once discharged, patients with severe mental illness often require ongoing or repeated periods of community treatment. Minimal attention has been given to the transition from hospital to community services. Approximately 70% of patients admitted to hospital are discharged without any treatment plan. In a number of developed countries, including the UK and the US, more than 60% of patients with severe mental illness are discharged without any further treatment. Often, these patients return to their previous levels of illness. The purpose of this literature review was to assess how successful current CTOs are in reducing the use of hospital care. Research indicates that people with severe mental illness are at risk of untreated psychosis and homelessness. This is likely to be caused by difficulties with community treatment. Detailed Aims
