The keys to most of the new features are in the right-click menus. You'll need a track pad, at least, or a mouse with right-click functionality to be able to use this new interface effectively. For example, a friend of mine told me to try the new Live Shift tool for correcting light and shadow. He discovered that you select a portion of the image and the tool applies the Shift in real time without the need to reopen the file. This is very useful and saves time. The Export dialog shows you the original, edited, and optimized versions, and you can make as many iterations as you want before sharing the optimized image. Mint recommends all new users of the Photoshop Express tool to delete their local metadata. In addition to allowing you to get much faster export performance, the new metadata management feature lets you manage and alter metadata without being in the Photoshop program. I usually prefer having that data stored within Photoshop, but that is a matter of taste. I think you'll like the new system as I did. Thankfully most of the new features in both the latest versions of Photoshop and Premiere Elements are easy to make use of. I was particularly astonished by the new Clones feature in some of the new tools. The Clone tool now lets you apply the exact changes made to the selection and make a clone from that point in real time. This could be a great tool for creating or correcting selections when you need to work with multiple layers. There are several other new features you can use with different tools which will be familiar to those who know Photoshop and Premiere.
